Modern estates can be extremely complex to manage when someone passes away with limited documentation, requiring executors to collate both physical (hard copy) and digital documents.

When making a Will we appoint executors; it is their job to ensure our wishes are met. This may involve detailed instructions, and at the very least will include the distribution of our assets.

Our executors, in turn, have a legal obligation to follow these instructions. They may be required to evidence this to a number of individuals and authorities.

But have you ever wondered how hard this could be for your executors? Documents that are stored or sent via email are likely to be password protected, as are online accounts, crypto, banking, shopping, policies and payment confirmations.

For those appointed as executors, beginning the task of managing your estate could be overwhelming - and they may struggle to know where to start.

Most executors are friends and family, who will be dealing with their own feelings of loss and grief. This could lead to mistakes or inaccuracies, for which they are legally responsible.
